I think the proposed Microsoft settlement is not adequate because it fails to remove from Microsoft the gains made from its illegal activities, and it will be very difficult to implement, as opposed to such a structural remedy as separating Microsoft's browser development activities from the rest of the company (a relatively simple remedy that would have a dramatic effect on the competitive landscape). In the absence of such a strong remedy, Microsoft will clearly continue on its path, even if adjusts a little, and will damage consumer choice.
